Recognizing that all students have different study habits, we feel that it is important to respect the needs of other students to ensure a positive academic experience for everyone. For years, different spaces on campus were governed by “unofficial rules” about volume level and appropriate behavior that were understood and respected by the student body. However, many students have noticed an increasing disregard for the unofficial rules and fewer and fewer truly silent spaces to study. As a result, silent studiers and librarians are faced with the unenviable choice of “shushing” their peers or suppressing their frustration and hunting for a new quiet place. Since students should not have ever have to leave a study space because other students are creating excess noise, we feel that making these rules official is an important step to providing a fertile academic environment.

As the guiding principle of the “How We Live” discussion, mutual respect between students is crucial to forming a strong community. At DePauw, we expect students to respect each other, and excess noise in silent study spaces is disrespectful. There are plenty of places on campus for students to meet in study groups, socialize, or hold a conversation. Students should be able to enter a study space and know what kind of noise level to expect. If basic study manners are followed, it will have an overall positive impact on the academic experience. By formally establishing rules for noise, students will know what is expected of them and behave accordingly. For these reasons, we call for the following expectations to be respected.

Silent Study Spaces
Personal etiquette in areas like the Prevo Reading Room, Prevo Basement, and 3rd floor of the Roy O’West are essential to keeping these areas extremely quiet for those students that need silence to work.

- Absolutely no noise
- Music on headphones
- No talking
- Eating kept to a minimum
- Cell phones set to silent, no phone calls
- No group projects

Slightly Social Study Spaces
In other common study areas, like the Julian Atrium, the 2nd floor of Roy O. West, and the GCPA library, noise expectations are more relaxed but should still result in a quiet study environment.

- Minimal whispering in short conversations
Music on headphones
Eating and drinking are permitted
Cell phones on vibrate, take phone calls elsewhere
No noisy group projects

Social Group Study Spaces
Because some students need a working environment that provides room for group work, study areas like the 1st floor of Roy O and Julian create a more social working environment, in which students should still be respectful of their peers, but a reasonable level of noise is permitted.

- Be respectful of your neighbors
- Social study spaces permitted
- Meeting Areas

Publicizing Expectations
1. White Paper: Passing this White Paper is an important first step to informing the DePauw community that we have expectations for noise levels in study spaces
2. Signage: We will create a clever marketing campaign to inform students what the expectations are for the silent spaces.
3. The DePauw: We will write an editorial/Letter to the Editor in The DePauw that will outline the expectations of each study area.
4. Campus Media: Utilize the library website, e-services, and DePauw Weekly to remind students of noise level expectations
