

Concerning the DePauw Dining Experience

Administrative Response

The DePauw Student Government white paper on the University's dining experience raises important issues regarding a key element of our residential liberal arts community, even beyond concerns related to the transition from the declining balance plan to a traditional swipe system. We would like to thank the DSG for the care with which they have presented their concerns and ideas, and their interest in the well-being of DePauw students and the quality of student life.

DePauw is in the midst of a multi-year transition in dining options. It is important, we believe, for students to see that the most recent changes to the meal structure at DePauw are part of a long and important set of intellectual and community enhancements at DePauw. The hope is that we can, at DePauw, create a meal plan structure that 1) serves healthy food options for all students; 2) ensures that students eat well throughout the semester; 3) provides flexibility, and 4) significantly contributes to the sense of community on the campus.

Background

Basic student living and eating patterns at DePauw have undergone very significant changes over the past several decades. Prior to 1984, over 90% of all students took all of their meals in Greek living units. In 1984 the University moved Greek unit pledging back to September of the first year, with students living in houses beginning in the sophomore year. The 1990s into the 2000s saw a general decline in overall Greek percentage. To accommodate the significantly increasing number of students eating in University facilities and to provide food options for faculty and staff, the University added the "Hub" to what was then an array of university-run dining options. The Hub was designed to be a quick, cash-and-carry food center (much like a mall "food court") complimenting what were then-existing traditional dining halls/rooms in Longden Hall and Hogate Hall (a traditional dining facility in Rector Hall was removed when the Hub was added). The Hub had a "pay-as-you go" model reflecting its design as a quick eating option (that is, one paid specifically for the individual items purchased.) It was expected that independent and first year students would take most of their meals in the more traditional dining facilities, all of which had the equivalent of a one-meal-one-swipe system.

The conversion of the dining area in Hogate Hall into a student health center, and the change of the dining facility in Longden into a casual, fast-food grill, placed increasing pressure onto the Hub. What was once designed to be a quick food court for students and faculty had thus by 2008 become the default central dining hall for an increasingly independent student body. Its declining balance pay system-- reflecting its original function as a place where students and faculty would grab a slice of pizza or a coffee on their way to class or activities--had created significant problems. By 2008 long lines in the Hub and large crowds drove more students to the Den, Café Allegro at the GCPA, and Café Roy in the library. Further, the University's reliance on a declining balance system placed significant numbers of students at risk of running out of sufficient funds to eat properly through the semester.

DePauw University, by 2008, had an unworkable, frustrating, and unhealthy dining structure.

In addition, the meal system was significantly undercutting the University's capacity to develop community through its fractured and difficult eating structure. Residential liberal arts colleges are designed to educate students in and outside the classroom. Nearly all national liberal arts institutions have in place centralized dining halls to foster community and to allow for continued intellectual conversations from the classroom. The 2010 University Campus Master Plan had as one of its primary recommendations the construction of an appropriate place for students and faculty to eat meals in common. A centralized facility—combined with an emphasis on meals in community—was thought to be a key element in the strengthening of DePauw's fractured community and fragmented intellectual life.

The engagement of Bon Appetit in 2012 was a significant moment for the University. DePauw engaged Bon Appetit because of its reputation for providing healthy and appealing dining options for students. Bon Appetit would provide meals at DePauw, rather than items for purchase as one saw at the Hub (which had a Pizza Hut station, and other fast-food-like options.)

The impending arrival of Hoover Hall also prompted a look at how the University was using mealtime to create community. Further, the rising problems that many students were experiencing with the declining balance system necessitated a significant review of the University's meal option.

Meal Plan Changes

The 2015-16 meal plan change resulted from feedback received from students, parents and faculty expressing concerns about students exhausting their meal plan money. To help manage their declining meal plan balance, DePauw provided students with a meal plan spending guide that calculated the remaining balance each week based on the number of meal days per semester (see Attachment A). However, the declining balance system was placing a significant number of students at peril of being unable to have food as the semester moved toward its culmination. Please note the following statistics as of April 23rd last year (with 25 days left in the semester).

Residence Hall Meal Plan

- 362 of 890 (40%) of students on the Residence Hall meal plan had spending balances less than the spending guide.
- 211 (23%) had less than $200 ($8 a day – enough for one meal a day)
- 125 (14%) had less than $100 ($4 a day)
- 93 (10%) had less than $50 – ($2 a day)
- 46 (5%) had $1 or less.

Rector Village Meal Plan

- 35 of 81 (43%) of students had spending balances less than the spending guide
- 19 (23%) had less than $200 ($8 a day)
- 17 (21%) had less than $100 ($4 a day)
- 14 (17%) had less than $50
- 5 (6%) had less than a dollar

UOAH Plan (Declining Balance Account)

- There is no spending guide for the plan
- 84 of 302 had less than $1
- 127 of 302 had less than $10

The statistics above, which were similar in prior years, indicated that significant numbers of students were at risk of having insufficient funds simply to eat as the semester came to its conclusion. These statistics were alarming and reinforced the need to fundamentally change the meal plan.

We reviewed how other universities like DePauw ran their food program and found that the majority of our peers offered a swipe program similar to the one instituted this fall in order to ensure that students are guaranteed a full-year of meals as part of their dining plan. Attachment B contains a comparison of meal plans at schools similar to DePauw.

Proposed Modifications

The following discusses responses to the suggestions offered in the DSG white paper that the University proposes to adopt in the near future.

Meal swipe structure:

A prominent concern raised is the expiration of “unused swipes” each week. This understandably results in the feeling of lost value when swipes go unused. However, the meal plan was designed to offer significantly more meals than were available under the declining balance plan. Under the former Residence Hall Meal plan, students had approximately $15 to spend a day, which bought about two meals a day at the Hub, or 14 meals a week. Under the new Residence Hall Meal plan, students on the Residence Hall Meal Plan have the option to have meal swipes each week for 18 meals served by DePauw Dining each week plus $200 in Flex Dollars and $50 for out in town eating per semester. The plan was constructed in anticipation of students having unused swipes, an intentional construct to ensure that running out of swipes was unlikely. We believe that the 18 meal swipe system, among the most generous seen in the nation, should remain in place.

Multiple swipes per meal period:

To help provide greater flexibility, beginning with the spring 2016 semester, the concept of meal periods will be eliminated. All meal plans will be permitted up to four swipes per day regardless of the timing of those swipes.

Student hunger issues:

An issue raised in the white paper is the issue of student hunger. As discussed earlier, this issue was the primary driver in implementing the new meal plan structure. Since students on meal plans can no longer run out of meal money during the year, the primary concern is whether students on UOAH plans with three or four meals per week have sufficient resources to eat for the other meals during the week. Representatives from Student Life reached out to students on UOAH meal plans this fall and have developed a short-term solution for those students who expressed need. We are in the process of evaluating long-term solutions to address this problem.

Meal plan structure:

The Administration will explore introducing an “unlimited” or “premium” plan once Hoover Hall opens next fall. A block plan for upperclassmen might also be a viable option provided that it includes a mechanism to prevent students from running out of meals within the semester. The premium and block plan models will be evaluated prior to the opening of Hoover Hall.

Transparency, food quality and feedback:

DePauw recently hired Bruce Clute as Director of Collaborative Community Initiatives and Auxiliary Services and his role will include oversight of food service operations. Mr. Clute is available to meet with the DSG Auxiliary Concerns Standing Senate Committee several times a semester to discuss student concerns and future plans for all auxiliaries.
